

NEUTRINO OBSERVATORY

High-energy processes in the universe produce neutrinos—fast-moving particles that rarely interact with matter. To detect them, scientists created the IceCube Neutrino Observatory in Antarctica. Eighty-six holes drilled in the ice contain over 5,000 optical sensors. In 2017, IceCube detected a super-high-energy neutrino that was traced to a galaxy 5.7 billion light-years away.

