

Moving forward

While feelings of rejection are unpleasant, they are temporary. An individual can take active steps to help them get over their rejection and stay productive. For a teen who is struggling with rejection, making the decision to do things that will enable them to move on will help them to feel more in control of the situation and their feelings.

Look after yourself

Feelings of rejection can make you feel drained both emotionally and physically. Eating healthfully, sleeping well, and staying physically active will keep your body healthy, and help kick-start your mind into recovering from the setback.

Talk things through

Discussing a problem with others helps you to reflect on what went wrong and to gain perspective when things feel overwhelming. Some people find counseling helpful, preferring to confide in someone they don't know.

Engage in physical activity

Keeping active is a great way of distracting yourself from any negative thoughts and feelings prompted by a rejection. It can feel good to be working toward a goal. Activity also makes the body release endorphins, its natural mood elevator.

Meet new people

People have a natural desire to be liked, and so they tend to emphasize their positive qualities when they meet new people. Attending an event or engaging in a hobby where you'll meet new people will make you see yourself in a new light.

Learn something new

Taking up a new hobby or learning a new skill encourages you to stop focusing on the rejection. It transforms negative feelings into positive experiences that remind you of all the skills, and the value, you have.

Make plans

Having a diary full of plans and arrangements helps you to find the fun in your life again. Engage in activities with others or on your own—it doesn't matter. Throw yourself into whatever excites you, be it meeting up with friends, sports, or studying.

