

Confidence and self-esteem

Confidence and self-esteem are often thought to be the same thing, but they are actually very different. Confidence describes how teens feel in specific situations, while self-esteem is related to about how teens feel about themselves.

Confidence

Someone's confidence is all about their trust and belief in themselves to do something well. Confidence is also specific to a situation—a person might be confident in their abilities to wow a crowd with a speech, but not confident in writing an essay.

A self-confident person, someone who believes in their own abilities, is more likely to embrace new challenges and responsibilities. Self-confidence is a positive trait that helps a person to make the most of their talents and develop new ones.

SEE ALSO

◀ 72–73	Body image
Introversion and extroversion	88–89 ▶
Bullying	150–151 ▶
Coming out	212–213 ▶

▽ Overcoming obstacles

Maintaining confidence when faced with challenges can be a challenge in itself, but small steps can lead to big achievements.

If a person believes and trusts in themselves, and builds on every experience, eventually they'll achieve their goal.

A person may not feel confident about everything they do, and that's okay. Expect to feel differently at different times.

Sometimes it can feel like an uphill battle. Be persistent and remember why these goals are important—this will help a person to keep going.

The first step to overcoming an obstacle is a person's belief that they can do it.

Onward and upward

When someone feels confident, they are more likely to tackle challenges with determination and spirit, which increases their chances of achieving their goals and ambitions. A lack of confidence can actually curb a person's progress, making small obstacles feel daunting. Obstacles are a part of life, but they shouldn't stop a person from doing what they want.

