

Animals in danger

Large copper butterflies are very nearly extinct because their marshy habitat is being destroyed.

Habitat destruction

Wild animals can die out due to lack of food and shelter if their habitat is destroyed.

Orangutans' rain forest habitats are being destroyed as trees are cut down to make way for farms.

Hunting

Wild cats, snakes, and crocodiles are hunted for their beautiful skins, as well as other parts of their bodies.

Snakes are killed by the thousands to make snakeskin bags and shoes.

Tigers are in danger of extinction because they are killed for their claws and teeth, used in Chinese medicines.

Zoos help rare animals like eagles breed. The young can then be released into the wild.

Laws ban rare animals such as tortoises from being sold as pets.

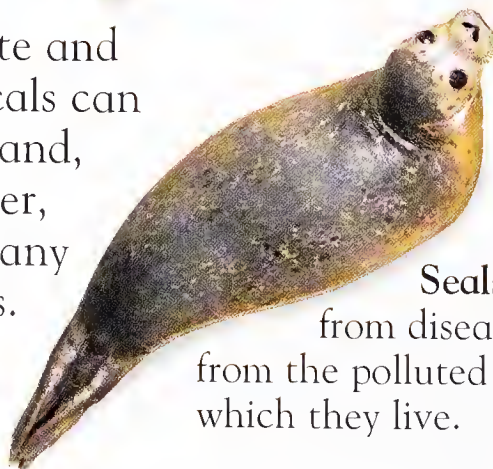

Did you know?

There are fewer than 200 pandas left in China's forests.

Pollution

Factory waste and farm chemicals can pollute the land, air, and water, poisoning many wild animals.

Seals can die from diseases caught from the polluted water in which they live.

Laws ban goods made from the skins of certain animals, like crocodiles.

Protecting animals

Large nature reserves give animals like elephants the space they need to live.
