

United States of America

Stretching across the North American continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, the United States is made up of 50 very different states and is home to 300 million people.

The Aleuts

In western Alaska and the Aleutian Islands are the Aleuts, who live off the sea and are skilled hunters.

I'm on the hunt.

Walt Disney World

Walt Disney's cartoon creations can all be found at the theme park Walt Disney World in Orlando, Florida.

They're in a world of their own.

Yellowstone

The oldest and largest national park in the United States, Yellowstone contains more than half the world's geysers.

Who's that geez?

Tornadoes

Several hundred twisters
a year run through "Tornado Alley" in Oklahoma, Kansas, and Missouri.

This is twisted.

Let me have a whirl.

Hollywood

The center of the U.S. film industry, Hollywood, California, is home to the annual star-studded Oscar awards.

I'm running away to be famous.

Surfin' USA

The huge Pacific rollers that crash onto the west coast make the California beaches an ideal place to surf.

— Hola, amigo.

Gulf of Mexico

The Gulf of Mexico is rich in oil, although massive hurricanes often stop production during the fall.

Did you say golf of Mexico?

Computers

The U.S. computer industry is based on the west coast, employing hundreds of thousands of people developing new software.

Like my screensaver?

Cowboys

Cowboys look after the vast herds of cattle that roam America's Wild West, although today most ride in 4x4 pickups.

I heard there was a herd nearby.

That's wild.

Baseball

Baseball is the national game of the United States. The winning teams of the National League and the American League compete each year in the World Series.

I'm out of steam.

Batter — up:

Mississippi

Huge paddle-steampers sail up and down the Mississippi River, traditionally carrying people and freight, but today carrying mainly tourists.

Jazz things up a bit.

One of America's greatest contributions to modern music, jazz originated in New Orleans around 1900.

Statue of Liberty

The 305ft- (93m-) tall Statue of Liberty stands in New York Harbor, a gift to the American people from the French in 1886.

Merci,
mes amis

Tickertape parade

American heroes parade through New York to streams of tickertape floating down on them from the skyscrapers above.

White House

The White House in Washington is the home of the U.S. president, who runs the country from the famous Oval Office.

Nice house!

Watch the windows!

Quit tooting your own horn