

Game of soccer

Watch a soccer game together in the park or at a local sports center: sit your baby on your knee and watch the game for a little while, pointing out where the ball is to help her eyes focus and track the movement. Also talk about the players and how they move around.

Diaper-free time

Don't forget to give your baby the freedom to kick and wiggle without a diaper on. Being diaper-free means she is able to improve aspects of her coordination, such as bringing her toes to her mouth. It's also good for her skin, too. Put her on a soft washable rug, make sure the room temperature is warm, and let her play.

What happens next?

Now that your baby is beginning to anticipate what happens next when you say or do something, tell her what you are going to do before you do it. For example, say, "I'm going to pick you up now," then stretch out your arms to her.

Natural mimic

You are still your baby's favorite play thing and she increasingly wants to imitate you, so keep talking expressively to her as you do your daily chores and activities together, and give her space to try to respond to you. Let her hold a clean cloth so she can copy you as you wipe down a table or her high chair, for example. Tell her what you are doing and see if she will babble in reply.

Name check

Your baby is learning quickly and in the next few months she will begin to recognize her own name. Start to use her name frequently now and she'll soon know you mean her.
