

Try these...

One too many

Place three small toys or colorful blocks your baby can hold in his hands in front of him. Hand one to your baby, and then another so his hands are full. Then offer him the third toy or block so he has to decide which object to drop in order to take the third one.

Make a father's or mother's day gift

Put together a gift from your baby for your partner: record his babbles or giggles as a ringtone on their phone, or have a photo of your family printed on a mug or canvas bag, for example. Or just make a simple homemade card with your baby's photo on the front.

Paste a photo of your baby onto a sheet of paper. Stick a few images from magazines of familiar objects or activities—a car, food, other babies, toys—around the photo with poster putty, and point to them as you describe them to him.

Change the images as often as you look at them.

Have a play date at home

If your baby is shy and finds baby and toddler groups overwhelming, invite a parent and their baby over to give him a calmer social experience. Set your babies down together on a rug with some toys; they will probably watch and even copy each other as they play their own games.
