

Continue your journey together

Keep up with your childbirth group by taking it to the next stage; why not try to catch up once a month, perhaps, and put the dates into the calendar. Some parents still arrange get-togethers 20 years later to share stories of family life. Since the children are the same age and have known each other since birth, both children and parents share deep ties.

If you want the rest of the family to join in, arrange to meet on weekends. You may all want to gather in the park for a picnic in the warmer months, or organize a potluck lunch for the adults at someone's house, and give your babies their own lunches together first.

Add to your repertoire

Your baby loves repetition, but he'll also enjoy new songs and poems now. If you want to add to your range of familiar nursery rhymes or change them—perhaps with some multicultural and modern verses—search online for new rhymes to bring yourself up to date. There is a wealth of online resources available, many with short videos so you can learn the tune and actions as well as the words. Enjoy practicing them together.
