

Set the alarm

If your baby is now in a regular sleeping routine, you may have more energy during the day. When he is down to sleep it's tempting to catch up on email or household chores; this can be unavoidable, but set an alarm on your phone to stop after 15 or 20 minutes and have some down time to relax so you are both refreshed when he wakes.

Balancing on a ball

At this age babies have to look at their hands to know where to put them; later on, once they are spatially aware, they don't need to check first by looking. Balancing your baby on a ball promotes his spatial awareness by providing feedback to his brain to tell him where he is in space. Hold him securely face down on his tummy on an aerobic or stability ball (available inexpensively online or from a sports store, or use a toy ball hopper). Gently tip him from side to side and backward and forward on the ball, making encouraging noises as you do so.
