

Ask direct questions

When you talk to your baby and ask him something, slow your speech down and emphasize certain words. You could ask, for example, “Do you want juice?” and show him his cup. Then wait for a response from him. Following a question with this quiet pause will help him learn that he needs to vocalize what he wants, and he will begin to understand that having a conversation involves taking turns.

Reverse peekaboo

Lay a light blanket or napkin over your baby’s head and then express shock that he is there when you pull off the blanket. He will enjoy the element of surprising you.
