

Try out a baby backpack carrier

Borrow or invest in a baby backpack carrier and go for a “real” walk along footpaths where you can’t take a stroller; you may want to make a day trip of it and have a complete change of scenery and environment. Looking out at the world from a new perch will delight your baby. He may fall asleep in the carrier if he is soothed by the rhythm of your walking pace, which should be fine; just make sure he is wearing the backpack harness and is sleeping in a comfortable position.

Take turns

Now is a good time to help your baby learn about taking turns when you do things together. Explain to him about taking turns and say, “My turn,” and “Your turn,” to introduce this idea as you play. For example, let him have fun shaking a rattle or banging on a drum or upturned saucepan with a plastic drumstick or wooden spoon, and then make a point of taking a turn yourself.

You can also use this tactic to get tasks done, such as washing his face or brushing his teeth: give him a washcloth to play with and then tell him it’s your turn to wipe his face.
