

Take a mini break

If your baby is finding it hard to be separated from you, start small and make it brief: 10–15 minutes apart is a good start. This very short separation is beneficial for your baby as she learns to be away from you, and it also gives you some much-needed space to recover your energy levels a little, clear your head, and have precious time to yourself.

Give your baby to your partner, a friend, or a grandparent. Tell her that you are going and will be back soon, wave bye-bye (never sneak out), and come back when you say you will. Go into your bedroom, shut the door, and have an uninterrupted phone call with a friend, read the newspaper or a magazine, take a shower, or just relax.
