

Dressing with a point

As you dress your baby, point to each piece of clothing and identify it first so she becomes familiar with its name. She may even try to copy you and point to it herself. To make it more of a game, you could ask a question first, for example, “Where is your undershirt?” then point to it, hold it up, say “Here it is!” and dress her in it.

Baby squats

Your baby may be eager to pull up from sitting to standing now. Sit her in your lap, turn her around to face you, check that her feet are resting on your thighs, and support her torso as she practices using her leg muscles to stand up. Let her push up and squat back down as many times as she wants, giving her lots of praise and encouragement.

Rock ‘n’ roll

For this activity—an extension of tummy time (pp66–67)—put a cylindrical cushion, or bolster, or a large beach towel rolled up tightly, on a smooth floor and rest your baby, chest down, on the cushion. Hold her feet slightly off the ground and see if she attempts to push herself forward on her hands, or rock back and forth. Encourage her if need be by rolling her very gently along the floor.

Never-ending scarves

For a simple game of cause and effect, tie the ends of several colored silky scarves together. Pack them into an empty tissue box and then help your baby pull the length of scarves from the box. Talk about the texture and color of each as you do it, and let her feel them against her skin.
