

Refresh your wardrobe

If your body has changed a little since you had your baby, you may now have time to rethink your wardrobe. Treat it like a seasonal edit: rearrange your wardrobe so you can easily see the clothes you currently like to wear. If you have storage space, pack away clothes that don't seem to fit quite right at the moment. If you enjoy visiting secondhand stores, turn the event into a weekly outing with your baby to search for a pre-loved item. Or take a shopping trip to buy a new top or piece of jewelry if you need to pull an outfit together—whatever works for you.

Hidden music

Your baby is learning about object permanence—that an object he can't see may still be there. Wind up or start a musical toy, or even use a radio, and hide it under a blanket where it will be easy for your baby to hear it. Ask him where the sound is coming from and crawl around with him to find it, or ask him to point to where the sound is if he's not crawling yet. Praise your baby when he finds the toy. As you repeat the game and your baby understands what to look for, find other places—under pillows, or behind furniture—to hide the musical toy.
