Community matters

Visit your local town hall, library, or community center to pick up details of drop-in activities available to you and your baby. There may be activities—some free—such as mommy-and-me groups, dads' sessions, library story times, and swimming lessons.

Introduce a question

As you play or as your baby eats a snack, introduce questions such as “More?” or “All gone?” with a raised tone, a lift of the eyebrows, and your head tilted. These words will form part of his earliest vocabulary and will help him let you know what he wants.

Swap chores

If you're bored with always doing the vacuuming and your partner has had enough of doing the household administration, swap tasks for a week.

Plan a treat

Your baby is at a good age to start being taken care of by a familiar grandparent or close relative overnight, so you may want to plan a night away while they babysit. If you can't find a babysitter, make plans for a special night in. If you are on your own, invite a friend or two over, order takeout, and plan some fun time together.
