

Arrange a musical playdate

Although your baby is still too young to play cooperatively with other children, he is starting to take more of an interest in the people around him. Invite your friends and their babies over for a music session: sit in a circle on the floor with your babies in your laps and sing some favorite action songs and rhymes together; the actions will help to develop the babies' gross motor skills. You should get a chance to share some laughter with your friends and your babies will enjoy watching each other and you.

You could also have a selection of rattles, maracas, and other simple toy instruments for the babies to play with.
