

Scarf play

If you are wearing a scarf, take it off with a flourish and let the tassled end dangle near your baby. Try tickling her hand with the tassles to catch her attention, then hold the scarf steady and see if she reaches out to feel it and tries to swipe at it.

Reading books to your young baby is a wonderful way of interacting and bonding with her. By reading out loud and talking about the pictures in a book, you are also familiarizing her with sounds and language from a very early age. If you aren't already a member, join your local library and choose a small selection of board books with big, bold pictures without much background detail.

Add to your journal

Try to fill in your baby's journal whenever you get the chance so you don't forget the precious memories of these early months: her eyes and hair color may be changing; her first real smile may appear; and she may be making new sounds.

Aunts, uncles, and cousins can all start to form part of your baby's wider family social circle now. Introduce them one at a time and give your baby the chance to look at their face and make eye contact as she begins to get to know them.
