

Calm baby

If your baby is showing signs that she's overstimulated, bored, or tired and in need of being held, turn off any background noise like the TV or radio—or take her to a quieter room—so she can only hear the sound of your voice. Hold her and talk to her in a low voice, or sing very gently. Hearing your voice and being so close to you will help reduce her stress level and keep her alert. If she relaxes completely, she may lie peacefully in your arms and look intently into your eyes, showing you that she is feeling calm and content.

Tracking toys

Gently move a toy across your baby's line of vision, softly rustling, rattling, or squeaking it as you go, and see if she can track the toy with her eyes. If her eyes follow the object, dangle a few different objects in front of her for her to try to swipe at or kick as she learns how to extend her limbs and use her hands. Use everyday objects, such as a bright ball of yarn, ribbon, or even a sparkly present decoration bow, as well as baby toys.
