

Tummy time

3
MONTH

When his neck muscles are strong enough for him to lift and turn his head a little, lay him on his front on a firm, comfortable surface. Position yourself in front of and slightly above him, talk gently to him and call his name, or play soothing music, and let him lie on his tummy for a few minutes. Gradually extend the tummy time as he gets stronger: get down on the floor next to him with a few toys to engage his attention and help him begin to move.

Tummy time is important to your baby's development, because it's a precursor to crawling, standing, and walking. If he's not happy lying on his front when you first put him on the floor, lay him on his tummy on your chest (as you lie on your back on the floor), and talk to him. After a few times like this, he may be happy to try tummy time for himself on the floor again.
