

Join a local music and movement class

Now is a good time to follow up you and your baby's enjoyment of music by joining a local parent and baby group, where you'll get the chance to sing and play with others. The social and musical elements will encourage your baby to make sounds and move. There may be free groups or classes available, so look online or in local venues such as libraries and community centers. Music and musical beats help your baby to develop an understanding of the patterns within speech.

Bouncing baby

Hold your baby securely around her middle and sit her on top of a stability ball (sports stores should have inexpensive versions, or you can buy one online or use a toy ball hopper). Bounce her gently up and down. This simple game can help her start to learn about where her body is in space, and will strengthen her tummy muscles.
