

The earliest forms of life were nothing more than single cells, so where did the 8.7 million species of plants and animals that we share our planet with come from? And why are they all so different? The answer lies in a process called evolution, where organisms adapt over generations to their surroundings by developing new features and characteristics that help them survive.

