

There are so many species that our planet could seem rather full. Luckily, we don't all want to live in the same places or eat the same things. However, that doesn't mean that every organism lives in harmony with its neighbors. Life can be very competitive, even among members of the same species. Despite this, everything on Earth is part of a close-knit community—if one species vanishes it can affect the whole ecosystem.
