

Washington, D.C.

The US capital of Washington, D.C., is not actually part of any state—it's known as a federal district. In 1790, Virginia and Maryland offered land to create this "District of Columbia." People often travel to Washington, D.C., to visit landmarks, or to protest against unfair laws.

The president of the United States lives in the White House in Washington, D.C.

Virginia's state dog is the American foxhound.

Back in time

One of the best museums in Virginia is actually a whole town! The buildings in Colonial Williamsburg are hundreds of years old, and horse-drawn carriages and actors in colonial clothing fill the streets.

These actors are dressed as British soldiers from the Revolutionary War.
