

Tapir

Large, leaf-shaped footprints on the rainforest floor will lead you to a tapir. You have to tread quietly though as this mammal is extremely shy. Although it can be as large as a donkey, it needs to hide from big cats — its main predators.

The tapir has a long nose, a bit like an elephant's trunk, which it uses to pick fruit and leaves to eat. When it needs to cool off it finds some gloopy mud to lie in. Baby tapirs appear very different to their parents.

They have a pattern of pale spots and stripes, which help them hide among patches of shadow and sunlight in the forest.
