

Next Mawu-Lisa commanded Aido-Hwedo to coil up and slither round and round in giant circles, creating deep holes in the rock.

The God of All Creation pulled clouds above the holes and ordered them to rain.

Water quickly filled the holes. Mawu-Lisa poured in fish, hippos, and other water creatures. The holes became lakes, full of life, and the other animals Mawu-Lisa had created gathered there to drink.

As he worked, Aido-Hwedo became hungry, so the God of All Creation fed him precious minerals and stones from the other planets in the universe. The serpent dragon digested huge amounts of these, and when they came out of his other end, they formed hills and mountains filled with treasures.

"Stop," commanded Mawu-Lisa on the third evening, "fly up so we can look at our work."

The serpent dragon took to the sky and flew the God of All Creation around the Earth that they had created together.

"I am worried," Mawu-Lisa said to Aido-Hwedo. "The Earth we created is too heavy."
