

A vibrant illustration of Amaru, a double-headed dragon from Inca mythology. The dragon's body is a thick, greenish-yellow serpent that coils around a terracotta-colored Inca temple with a staircase. The dragon has two heads: one is a bird with a white head, yellow beak, and brown wings; the other is a jaguar with a yellow face and brown spots. The background is a mix of green, blue, and brown, suggesting a natural setting.

Amaru

This huge double-headed dragon appears in South American Inca mythology. It is said to have emerged from a mountain during a time of colossal earthquakes.

APPEARANCE

A winged serpent with the head of a bird and a jaguar or puma. Though occasionally it had the head of a llama. All these animals were considered to be sacred.

DWELLING

Under ground and at the bottoms of lakes and rivers.

POWERS AND TRAITS

- Said to carry medicine from the three realms (the Earth, the sky, and the underworld)
