

Get to know me

I'm not actually a violet; it's just that my flowers have a striking resemblance to true violets. As my name suggests, I was first found in the hills of Tanzania in East Africa, but in the wild I don't just grow in tropical places. I can also grow in the mountains, sheltered under other plants.

My flowers steal the show

I can also be found in pink, white, blue, and red, and even with different patterns on my flowers, such as stripes, or with my petal edges tinted. Look out for my double-flowering varieties, too. To encourage me to bloom, I should get about 10 hours of indirect light a day.

I'm fussy about water

First, I like lukewarm water, as very cold water can chill me. I can also rot if I have too much, so water me from the bottom and never let me sit in water. Allow my soil to dry out between waterings to encourage me to flower, and please don't get water on my hairy foliage, as it can mark.

Let's make babies

Make new plants from me by taking leaf cuttings with the stalk attached. Cut off the top of the leaf to encourage faster root growth, then pot it up in seed or cutting compost. More than one plantlet may grow, and once they are big enough to handle, repot them into an all-purpose potting mix.
