

“Having living things in a house is what makes it a home.”

natural environment, and dull, urban spaces devoid of plants can quickly become oppressive and induce feelings of anxiety. Having living things in a house is what makes it a home; family, pets, and plants all coexist to create that sense of coziness. Adding growing plants and the natural colors of foliage and flowers can give a positive boost to your home and your mental state, reinforcing a feeling of security and familiarity and proving a happy sight to welcome you home.

- Share the joy Sharing your delight in houseplants with others adds another dimension to the magic of growing them. Keeping friends and family up to date with your successes will help you connect with them, as well as instill confidence in yourself, while making a gift of plants you have grown yourself shows love and care and will spread positivity to loved ones who see you nurturing life. Receiving a plant as a gift, meanwhile, is a living reminder of the person who gave it to you—every time you see it, it will lift your spirits.

Plant pets

As living, breathing organisms, plants can help bring a house alive, adding to the warmth and familiarity of your domestic space and even becoming a much-loved part of your family.

If you have pets, choose plants that aren't toxic when eaten or chewed
