

ENGAGING KIDS WITH HOUSEPLANTS

Getting children interested in plants will give them the best start in life, encouraging a positive interaction with living organisms and creating a healthy balance between artificial and natural environments. How you get them involved will depend on their age, but they'll soon be hooked.

Child-friendly chores

By the age of four, children will be able to start looking after houseplants such as aloes, jade plants, and living stones.

Babies and toddlers

These early years are magical and the perfect time for a child to have their first contact with indoor plants. For the very young, tactile plants such as the maidenhair fern and velvet plant offer a captivating sensory experience. And for the older children in this group, planting an amaryllis bulb and watching it grow will perfectly showcase the wonder and beauty of nature.

Young children

This age group is ready to take on watering duties and look after their own houseplants. Fun, safe varieties include string of hearts, the fascinating living stones, aloes, and jade plant (though still make sure they don't taste the leaves)—all of which are visually arresting yet easy for little ones to care for.

“Planting an amaryllis bulb will perfectly showcase the wonder and beauty of nature.”