

Look out for my flowers

I will enrich your senses of sight and smell with my spring blooms, which are salmon pink and have a subtle sweet fragrance.

I open out into small tubular pink blooms

Get to know me

I am native to Namibia and South Africa, and I have many common names, such as partridge breast aloe or tiger aloe, because of my striking markings. In South Africa, they call me kanniedood, meaning “cannot die.”

Care and share

If you see pups appearing at my base, you can pull them away once the shoots are 3–4in (7–10cm) long and repot them, ready to pass on to friends and family—as such a low-maintenance plant to care for I make a perfect gift.

Be mindful of me

I am from a very dry area, so I do not like being in soggy compost. Please do not put me in a pot cover and let water sit in the bottom, because it rots my roots. I am better off being neglected than pampered.

BE AWARE: I can be mildly harmful if eaten, so keep me away from young children and pets.
