

I love rainwater

I am sensitive to fluoride, which is found in some tap water. Fluoride can build up in my leaves, impacting on the photosynthesis process and making my leaves turn yellow or dry, so I would really appreciate it if you used distilled water or rainwater to keep me healthy.

I may just flower

When I'm in my native habitat, I flower with yellow blooms that are followed by small fruits, which are also yellow. Even if you care for me perfectly, it's unlikely that I'll ever bloom indoors as a houseplant—but you never know!

Get to know me

My Latin name lutescens means “becoming yellow,” which refers to the tall yellow stems that support my leaves. For this reason, I am also known as the “golden cane.” If my leaves turn yellow, however, it may mean I'm getting too much sun or too much water.
