

Mix the dry powders and the wet ingredients together well.

Listen carefully, and you can hear the mixture sizzle.

3 Using a tablespoon, begin to stir all of the ingredients so that everything is well mixed. At this stage, you will notice that the mixture is still quite powdery and that tiny globules of food coloring remain—don't worry, the consistency will change when you add water in the next step.

4 Now add a few sprays of water to the mixture, which will sizzle as the cream of tartar dissolves in the water and begins reacting with the baking soda.

Push the mixture into the shape of a cliff—if it crumbles, add a little more water.

5 The mixture should look and feel less powdery now, and be more like wet sand. Push your spoon into the mixture—if it leaves behind a good shape without crumbling, you are ready to transfer the mixture to the molds. If necessary, spray some more water and mix again until you get the required consistency.

Spoon out your mixture into each mold.

Fill up each mold close to the top.

Put the same amount in each mold.
