

DISTANCE NO OBJECT

One of the strangest quantum effects, entanglement arises from the nature of the quantum wave function itself. Pairs of particles produced in a single interaction share a common origin and cannot be described independently of one another. The particles can be separated by a vast distance, yet when the properties of one particle are measured, its entangled partner somehow instantaneously “knows,” and itself collapses to the appropriate state.

