

BULBS

Bulbous plants are found throughout the world in habitats as diverse as woodland and scrub, meadows, river banks, the edges of streams, and rocky hills and mountains. There are bulbs to suit every garden site and design—from the tiny Iris danfordiae for a rock garden, to daffodils and tulips in beds and borders, and carpeting erythroniums or the statuesque Cardiocrinum giganteum for a woodland garden. Most have a distinct flowering season, yet with careful planning it is possible to extend or enhance this period of interest. The majority bloom in spring or early summer, producing splashes of color before many shrubs and perennials reach their peak; others (such as snowdrops) provide a late winter display, while colchicums, cyclamen, and some crocuses will brighten a fall day.
