

DOGS

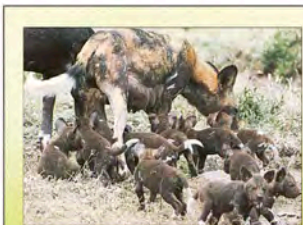

On its own, a dog can only trap animals that are smaller than itself, but 20 African hunting dogs working together can easily catch and kill a zebra. Many dogs have learned this lesson and prefer to live and hunt in family groups, called packs. The 39 types Hooooowl!

In the dead of night, the wolves in a pack get together, throw back their heads, and howl. This warns other wolves to keep out of their territory.

Gray wolves are about three feet (one meter) tall. They live in Canada, the US, Europe, and northern Asia.

Team effort

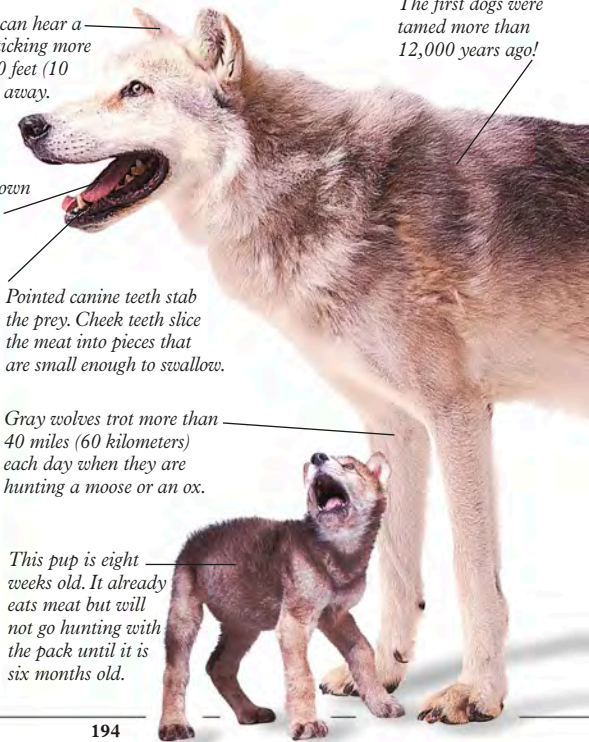

Female African hunting dogs can have as many as 16 puppies. They are looked after by the whole pack, not just the mother. They are even suckled by other females.

of wild dogs have often been treated as enemies, not loved like pet dogs. Wolves have been wiped out in many places. Foxes only survive because they are smaller and more cunning.

A wolf can hear a watch ticking more than 30 feet (10 meters) away.

Dogs cool down by panting.

Pointed canine teeth stab the prey. Cheek teeth slice the meat into pieces that are small enough to swallow.

Gray wolves trot more than 40 miles (60 kilometers) each day when they are hunting a moose or an ox.

This pup is eight weeks old. It already eats meat but will not go hunting with the pack until it is six months old.

All pet dogs have been bred from gray, or timber, wolves. The first dogs were tamed more than 12,000 years ago!
