

Lumbering lawn mowers

Every night, hippos leave the water and spend five or six hours grazing. They march back into the water, down well-worn paths, long before the scorching sun rises.

Plucky peccary

If a mountain lion attacks a group of peccaries, one brave animal may charge the lion with its sharp tusks while the others escape, but it will be lucky to survive.

Pigs on parade

Bush pig

Collared peccary

Underwater ballet

Hippos can hold their breath for more than five minutes. This is plenty of time to dive down and tiptoe gracefully across the bottom of the lake.

To keep cool and moist, hippos spend 16 hours a day up to their necks in water.

The hippo shuts its ears and nostrils when it is under water.

Thick skin protects the hippo from snapping crocodiles.

There are four toes on each foot.

Hippos do eat water lilies, but prefer grass.

Hippo

Pygmy hippo

