

Africa

Equatorial Guinea

A silk-cotton tree is featured on the national flag.

Social baboon

The world's largest baboon species, mandrills live in big hordes in the rain forests of this region, foraging for fruit and insects on the ground.

On the volcano's edge

The port city of Malabo, built on the rim of a volcano on Bioko Island, exports cocoa, wood, and coffee from its deep harbor.

Africa Cup qualifier

Soccer is a popular sport in Equatorial Guinea.

The national soccer team has twice qualified for the Africa Cup of Nations.

Five islands and the mainland territory of Rio Muni make up Equatorial Guinea. An oil boom has fueled the building of a new capital, Ciudad de la Paz, in the rain forest.

- ☑ 10,831 sq miles (28,051 sq km)
- 👤 836,000
- ★ Malabo
- 🗣 Spanish, Fang, Bubi, French

São Tomé and Príncipe

0 50 km
0 50 miles
(approximate scale)

Pico Cão Grande

The needle-shaped Pico Cão Grande, meaning "Great Dog Peak," is a landmark on São Tomé Island. This towering volcanic rock stands 1,266 ft (386 m) tall.

Chocolate islands

Chocolate makers have set up cooperatives to grow cocoa on the islands, feeding a global appetite for high-quality, fairly traded chocolate.

Cocoa pods

- ☑ 372 sq miles (964 sq km)
- 👤 211,000
- ★ São Tomé
- 🗣 Portuguese Creole, Portuguese

The two mountainous islands of São Tomé and Príncipe and their islets lie off the west coast of Africa. Their jungled slopes throng with endemic birds, such as the giant sunbird, and tree frogs. São Tomé, the bigger island, is home to the capital.