

she was college-educated and interested in giving the princesses as “modern” a royal education as she could.

Most days the princesses spent a short time after breakfast with their parents, before lessons began in the classroom. Here, seated at desks, Miss Crawford was in charge of the girls each day from 9 a.m. In the morning there were regular lessons. After lunch came singing, music, and dancing. Sometimes there’d be an afternoon outing—perhaps to nearby Hamilton Gardens, where they could at least see other children, or a walk in Green Park. Visits to Madame Tussaud’s waxworks or London Zoo were special treats. So was a ride on the top deck of a red London bus, peering down at the busy city streets. Tea was at 4:45 p.m., with their parents.

Sometimes, Elizabeth’s uncle, Edward, Prince of

