

the princesses along, but it was decided they were too young. While her parents were away,

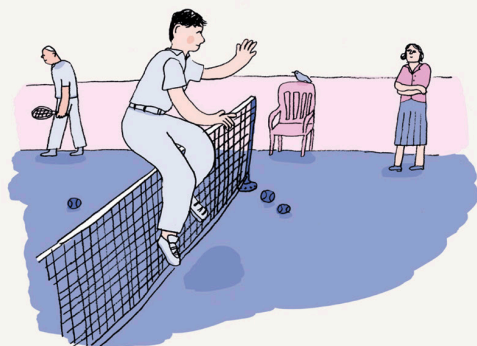

Elizabeth used a special camera to take photos and films to show them.

They replied with the first royal transatlantic phone call. Soon they were all home for the rest of the summer, and paid a visit to the King's old school, Dartmouth naval college. That day, Princess Elizabeth once again met her distant cousin Philip, now a naval cadet. He was 18, and less shy than she was. He made jokes and showed off by leaping over the net on the tennis court. He said he was looking forward to going to sea. He might have to fight too, since everyone said there could soon be a war ...

DID YOU KNOW?

When King George VI went to see President Franklin D. Roosevelt in the United States, it was the first-ever visit from a British king.