

wedding with no frills. There was no public holiday, but there was a splendid wedding cake—even though powdered sugar was still being rationed. The government let the princess have 100 extra ration coupons for her wedding clothes.

Afterward, the King wrote to his daughter. He had been “so proud and thrilled” he said. The King added that he knew he would always be able to rely on Elizabeth and Philip to help him in his work. There was more good news to come. In November 1948, Elizabeth gave birth to a baby boy named Charles.

The following year, Philip took command of the warship HMS Magpie, based at Malta in the Mediterranean Sea. For a short while, the princess enjoyed “normal” life as a Navy wife and mother.

There was another addition to their young family, when, in 1950, Elizabeth gave birth to a baby girl named Anne. Everyone was
